WHEW, A HUNDRED-TO-ONE SHOT... BUT IT WORKED!

WHEN I SAW ALL THE ZIGZAGGING DOWN IN THE VALLEY, I FIGURED THOSE NAZIS INSIDE WERE SO FULL OF SPIT-AND-POLISH THAT THEY WERE THINKING MORE ABOUT KEEPING THEIR TANK CLEAN-- THAN OF WHAT WAS GOING ON AROUND THEM!

YEAH, SO YOU HAD US MOVE THE GARBAGE DUMP!

AND THE SIGHT AND SMELL OF THAT ROADBLOCK OF OURS, MADE THE NAZIS FORGET WHAT THEIR MAP MUST'VE TOLD THEM-- THAT THE EDGE OF THE CLIFF WAS JUST BEHIND WHERE THEY'D HAVE TO GO AROUND!

RED TO RED EAGLE--ARE YOU STILL HOLDING OUT? WHERE IS THAT TIGER NOW... OVER!

SHE'S RIGHT HERE, COLONEL-- BUT BETWEEN YOU AND ME, SIR... IN THE SHAPE SHE'S IN, SHE LOOKS MORE LIKE A PUSS! CAT THAN A TIGER!

"CLEVER CATAPULT"

The ruins of the smashed Red tank provided for the time being good protection to Lieutenant Frank Courtney and the six men with him. They were about one hundred yards away from the railroad embankment. On the other side was the machine gun nest manned by soldiers of the North Korean People's Army. The tall quiet man in charge of the American soldiers realized the seriousness of their position. When darkness would come the Reds could afford to take a chance. Move their heavy machine gun up to the top of the embankment and spray the area with a deadly and destructive hail of bullets. As though guessing what was in the officer's mind, Sergeant Mike Zisser looked at the friendly sun above.

"In five hours it will start to be dark. Then what? We sit here like a bunch of ducks waiting for those guys to give us the works. Say the word, Lieutenant and we'll make a dash for it. Maybe they'll get some of us but we could wipe them out."

"Orders are orders," reminded the officer in a voice that wasn't too severe. "We must wait here until reinforcements come. And that will be by morning at the latest. It would serve no purpose to throw away your lives. By tomorrow morning the tanks will take over the job."

"Maybe we should ask them to surrender?" suggested Private Joe Shinn. "I learned a couple of phrases in Korean. I can say I am sick: NAH-noon-CHAWM KAW-dahn HAHM-nee-dah."

"Wonderful the things they teach you in this man's army," commented Private Morris Klien. "You listen to those army records and learn anything from Korean to Persian. Go ahead and show off. Yell at those guys and ask them to surrender in Korean."

"This I can't do," sadly admitted Private Joe Shinn. "I only listened to the first six records on how to speak Korean back in Poo-yung. When we return I'll play the rest of the records and learn it."

"If you guys haven't any objection," chipped in Private Sam Cheney. "I'll go right back now to Poo-yung and get the rest of those records. Also bring back an apple pie and some strawberry ice cream for the gang."

They all laughed at that last remark except Private Albert Magrill. He hadn't said a word at all. At the most he could have been twenty and he actually looked like a teen ager. The Lieutenant was worried about the soldier. For when a man is scared and frightened, then anything can happen.

"What kind of ice cream do you like?" asked Lieutenant Frank Courtney. "When we get back we should all have a celebration."

"We'll never get back alive," snapped the young soldier, "If we just sit here. There will be no moon or stars tonight. I know my weather. Took that army course. I'm not scared, sir. I just would like to fight."

"Let's say you are worried," interrupted Sergeant Mike Zisser. "Doesn't it dawn upon your thick skull that the Reds on the other side of the track may also be worried. They know we are here, but they don't know what kind of weapons we are carrying. True, we got our grenades and M1's. But as far as they are concerned we may have machine guns."

Captain Loo Ying, of the North Korean People's Army looked at the expressionless faces of his soldiers. Their orders had been to remain at this spot and die. When the last machine gun bullet had been expended they were to fight with their rifles and knives. On the other side of the embankment were a group of American soldiers. They were waiting for reinforcements. Their only protection was that smashed Red tank.

"Why don't they fire at us?" asked Sergeant Sim Kung. "If they fired at us then we would know where they are?"

"Silent, pig," half shouted Captain Loo Ying. "When the sun goes down we will move the machine gun up to the top of the embankment and kill all of them."

"Providing they do not kill us first," commented Private Soo-Gung with a bit of insolence in his voice.

"Quiet or I will kill you with my own hands," replied Captain Loo Ying who did not like the state of affairs. He was worried that the idea of surrendering might be in his men's minds.

"If you kill me, then who will repair the machine gun if it gets out of order?" slyly reminded Private Soo-Gung.

The Red captain chose to ignore that last remark. He had heard all kinds of stories about what the Americans did with their prisoners. But he also remembered what he had learned at Mission school, that the Americans were good and kind. Suppose he did surrender? It would mean he could never go back to Red China. Maybe the Americans could make use of his ability to speak and write their language.

On the other side of the embankment, Private Albert Magrill picked up a heavy and undamaged spring that had once been part of an enemy tank. He pressed the bottom part of the spring against a piece of metal. It yielded with pressure.

"I got it! I got it!" he shouted with joy in his voice. "We can lick them Reds and not be exposed to any danger."

"Sure you haven't been affected by the strain of waiting?" questioned the Lieutenant. "Go ahead and tell me about the brain storm that just seized you."

"I had Mrs. Hilda Roylan in Medieval History back in Centerport High School. If you missed a question she made you write an essay of two thousand words. Also look up the subject in five or six reference books. I didn't know what a catapult was nor how it was constructed. So that was my punishment. To know it until it became something real for me. The origin of the catapult seems to have been a bent-over, forked sapling for hurling rocks. However, this idea was improved till it became a bulwark in offensive and defensive warfare.

A heavy wooden framework carried strong rope strands across the base. Into these twisted ropes went the tossing beam with a cuplike holder at the top. Winches pulled back the thrower, twisting the rope so that a great force was stored as in an elastic cord or spring. When released, the throwing beam whirled up and forward, struck against the brake timber, and tossed its rock from the cup a few hundred yards. They even made a catapult with a spring and called it a spring thrower. Don't you get the big idea, Lieutenant? We can make a spring thrower and hurl our hand grenades across the embankment. We can even throw the grenades at different angles so that the enemy won't just know where we are situated."

The officer knew the dangerous situation in which he and his men were placed. What did they have to lose? Maybe that idea might work. Anyway he once remembered seeing a movie back in the states. The Romans were laying siege to a town and used catapults to gain victory.

"You're the boss," he announced. "We'll help you and you better figure it out in a hurry to work. That sun is heading for the horizon."

Captain Loo Ying was restless as he too watched the setting sun. In an hour there would be darkness. He was about to give an order to one of his men when a small object was seen high above them.

"Duck," he shouted almost instinctively. "Faces down."

The grenade exploded at a safe distance from the Reds but they were visibly shaken for this looked something like mortar fire. A second grenade followed and this one was closer. Apparently the Americans had some new kind of war weapon.

On the other side of the embankment Sergeant Mike Zisser placed the third hand grenade in place on a small platform thrower.

"Go on baby," he coaxed the missile, "and make a home run for us."

Tension was released and this time the grenade came so close that earth and stones were thrown on the bodies of the Reds.

"I don't want to die," moaned Sergeant Sim Kung. "Let us surrender."

Captain Loo Ying tied his white handkerchief to a rifle and slowly climbed up the side of the embankment. He waved it three times and then stood erect.

"All of you come here with your hands up," shouted Lieutenant Frank Courtney.

Mrs. Hilda Roylan was very puzzled at the letter she received informing her that her student, Albert Magrill had been awarded a medal. But more puzzled than the teacher was General William C. Wanderliff who had given the final O.K. to the awarding of the medal.

"Lucky thing for Lieutenant Courtney that he is the son of my buddy, General Courtney," remarked General William C. Wanderliff to one of the Pentagon officers. "In the form he filled out for the awarding of a medal what do you think he said in regard to weapon used? An ancient catapult! Some sense of humor."
